Grounded acts as a battery in its primary function, but also responds to the serenity of the environment by creating a meditative space where visitors can come to recharge their spiritual energy. Each rammed earth block is tunneled through, allowing the combined sculpture to form labyrinthine paths throughout. Although the scale and maze of the blocks can be daunting, they allow the viewer to be surrounded by earth while the singular path allows them to turn their focus inward, trusting the carved earth around them to guide their path in an introspective journey.

Openings throughout the path not only allow light into the space, but also frame different views of Fly Ranch. From the upper levels of the structure, the mostly flat topography of the site allows for a view that stretches 20km.

Each block contains a single tunnel passing through. The only branches off of this path are openings to allow light into the space. This prevents the path inside the structure from becoming a maze in which one can get lost, but rather a labyrinth—a continuous path that eventually returns to the starting point. These paths will be predetermined by the artist designing the structure’s form.